

EARN A PH.D. IN HISTORY

FIU's Ph.D. program is one of the nation's first and longest-standing Ph.D. programs in Atlantic history.

The Ph.D. program at FIU stresses comparative studies and innovative transnational training in the history of the Atlantic world from pre-colonial to modern times. Doctoral students refine their intellectual skills to gain a strong foundation in researching an area and themes of their choosing.

- Strong foundation in the history of the Atlantic world
- Focus on pre-colonial times to the modern era
- Opportunities to specialize in geographical regions and themes
- Train with award-winning faculty
- International and national research fellowships and post-docs available
- Prepare for tenure-track positions at R1 institutions

Since the mid-fifteenth century, the Atlantic has provided the corridor for fundamental exchanges of peoples and technologies. It has also served as a platform for the transfer of ideas defining and challenging communities across wide spans of time and space. The principle behind the Atlantic Civilization focus of the doctoral program in History at Florida International University is to explore the many dimensions of these exchanges. Capitalizing on the department's notably strong resources and faculty, the program is designed around a curriculum that emphasizes the comparative framework of the Atlantic experience while reflecting the vitality of a cross-disciplinary approach.

Many students incorporate the study of the Atlantic into their field exams and write comparative or transnational dissertations that engage with multiple aspects or regions of the Atlantic Basin. The department also offers doctoral students strong thematic training in topics such as empires and colonialism; women, gender, and sexuality; law; public health; slavery and race relations; and public history and memory.
